STIRRING NEWS OF

A Great Silk Sale Tomorrow!

$1.25 Louise, 69c yd.

The goods have just arrived—they represent a deal just consummated by our silk buyer, who is now in New York. The lot comprises 100 pieces of the very finest quality Fancy Louise Silks. The color combinations are as perfect as a loom could possibly produce, the cloth is soft and pliable, and will not crush—the wear is guaranteed. If you think of lining a new coat or refining an old one, buy the makings of a silk waist, anticipate your trimming needs, or, perhaps, an entire silk dress is wanted—in either case these silks will fill the bill. Really, if you have any silk wants whatever for present or future use, attend this greatest of all Silk Sales and save one-half on your purchase. When you see the goods you'll also see this fact verified: That never in the history of mercantile events have such new, beautiful, and stylish silks at the very beginning of a season been offered at less than end-of-the-season prices. There's no time to demur—early comers will show their wisdom. There's an enormous saving to be made, besides the satisfaction of getting first choice. Remember, these Fancy Louise Silks are retailed the country over at $1.25. Here while they last at only SIXTY-NINE CENTS yd. ON DISPLAY AND SALE SILK DEPARTMENT, EIGHTH STREET ANNEX.

WASHINGTON'S GREAT ZOO.

Great Britain Commends the Reservation at Rock Creek Park.

An Ideal Scheme for the Preservation of Big Game and Western Animals—Life Possibilities of the Future—Nature Should Be Left Alone.

In 1887 S. P. Langley was appointed Secretary of the Smithsonian Institute, and although a physicist, he was one of the first to realize that America was tamely submitting to the unnecessary and immeasurable loss of all her superb game animals. And as a means of heading off this loss he devised the scheme of a National Haven, where each of the national States should have a little region of its own in which to "perpetuate its race in peace," and where it might be forever available for the student or the domesticator.

After several years of wrangling with officialdom, he succeeded in getting the money appropriated by Congress to make such an ideal park Zoo on a tract of 167 acres that was secured along Rock Creek, near Washington. The tract, in idea, had been to provide only for those native species that were threatened with extermination; to give to each a large range of many acres of wild land in which to live, and to entirely discard the old-fashioned box cage menagerie idea.

But the conditions imposed by Congress required that it be made a "place of amusement and instruction for the people." The effect of this was to make the scheme to some extent. The small parks were duly instituted for the various deer, but in the central building were also to be lions, tigers, monkeys, and other showy creatures, which the people differed only from the well-known types in being larger, better built, and more sensibly arranged.

The park tract was by nature of great attractiveness to wild birds. It was diversified and watered by a small and picturesque river, rocky cliffs, and open grassy glades, pine-cliff heights, and slopes with oak and hickory groves.

Always favored by the birds, and squirrels, Mr. Langley has aimed to make it a paradise of living creatures by developing and adding to all its allurements, providing nesting places and food supplies, and, by guaranteeing the fullest measure of safety.

But the individual parks or paddocks are the most novel and important features. To each of the native horned ruminants, the buffalo, goat, and elk, and the deer, and the bison, it is intended to give a little park of its own where its native surroundings will be reproduced as far as possible, and where the animal may perpetuate its species for the student of the future, and show us how it used to live in the wilds where it is native.

The buffalo have more than one paddock, as the available acreage is not sufficient to enable the director to give them as large a range as they desire. To the Great West, and the limitation of space means more management. Nevertheless, they have prospered and increased each year, which is good proof of the soundness of the system.

But the commodious park set aside for the elk is not merely a good reproduction of the native range, it is actually part of it. The neighborhood of Washington is certainly within the ancient geographical limits of the elk species. And the appearance of the herd does not incline one to look for the early extinction of cervus canadensis.

Elk, however, have never proved a difficult species to keep. Antelope, on the other hand, have defied all efforts to keep them in captivity. Not only in foreign countries, where the difference in climate was probably sufficient explanation, but in America as well, captive antelope have invariably pined away in a short time.

A novel feature of these parks is the invisible wire fencing that is exclusively used. It is tight enough to keep in a very small animal and yet strong enough to hold the biggest buffalo bull. At a short distance it is lost sight of, and the effect is much as if the animal in the park were without any fence at all.

The Virginia deer also are fortunate in having a section of their ancient habitat consecrated for them as a haven of refuge, and all of their wild habits are here resumed without the slightest restraint. One can see them seeking their food in early morning, hiding in the dense thickets in noontide heat, and living their lives much as their wild ancestors did on these very grounds less than 100 years ago.

In the brook below the hill are the beavers. Their indefatigable industry speedily resulted in two large dams and one or more houses, about which they afford daily object lessons of their traditional methods.

Among the plans that the secretary has for future development is a Rocky Mountain trail, which will include a variety of cliff and numerous sheltered wood nooks, where the mountain sheep, goat, and bison, and their harmless neighbors the mountain hare and marmoset, may dwell together and reproduce the lives they lived in the West.

Another of these enclosures is planned for the great American bison, which were once so numerous that they were a pest to the settlers, and one on a small scale is already realized for the coons in the center of the grounds. Rocky Creek, an old tree, which is the main range of above thirty well-to-do coons that live here as contentedly as anywhere.

A more curious creature is the American porcupine, which is a pest to the settlers, and one on a small scale is already realized for the coons in the center of the grounds. Rocky Creek, an old tree, which is the main range of above thirty well-to-do coons that live here as contentedly as anywhere.

SOCIETY.

The young man of the Chinese Minister, with his governess, is at the White House, to stay throughout September.

The poor of Newport never have cause to complain of any want of generosity on the part of the wealthy villa owners. Not only are the charities of Newport well supported, but it has become the custom on the occasion of great events, such as weddings in great families, to give simultaneous entertainments to the poor of the city. Mr. and Mrs. Shaw have carried this custom a little further than any other.

On September 12, 1900, when the bride party and wedding guests sat down to the wedding feast nearly 300 poor children of Newport also had a banquet. On Thursday, Mr. and Mrs. Shaw celebrated the first anniversary of their marriage by giving a dinner to 200 of Newport's poor children. The boys and girls were taken to Island Park in special cars. They had a shore dinner, saw all the sights, and had a vaudeville show of their own as well.

SCHWARTZ,

LADIES' TAILOR.
IMPORTER.

I beg to announce to my esteemed patrons that I will reopen my establishment on Monday, September 16, with a full assortment of imported goods and most exquisite models for Fall wear.

My brother, Mr. F. Schwartz, who has just returned from Europe, was successful in securing models of Paquin, Doucet, Raudnitz, and others for our establishments in Washington and New York City, arrangements having been made whereby they are to inform us of the newest cuts, styles, and trimmings that will be introduced in mid-season.

I am now fully equipped with the best of skilled workmen, having secured the services of tailors formerly with Messrs. Polefine, Glasgow, and Weingarten, of New York City, and am prepared to take orders on Skirts, Coats, and Suits, ensuring prompt delivery and perfect satisfaction as to fit, style, and workmanship.

On all orders placed with me before the 1st of October a reduction of $10 will be made on each suit.
